About Condominium Ownership

A condominium is a form of property ownership where the homeowner owns an undivided percentage of the Common Elements such as the building siding, roofs, lawns, trees, mailboxes and access driveways, as well as a living Unit. Condominiums also have property known as the Limited Common Elements which are owned by all homeowners, but whose use and maintenance is exclusively granted to a particular Unit owner.

Association Operations

All homeowners are automatically members of the Unit Owners Association and are required to pay a monthly maintenance fee to cover the cost of the operation of the association and maintenance of certain Common Elements. The Association is governed by a Board of Directors who administer association operations as outlined by the Declarations of Condominium Ownership, By-laws, and Rules and Regulations. All homeowners are required to comply with the provisions of these documents. Some of the provisions of the governing documents include restrictions on the use and/or alteration of the buildings or other Common and Limited Common Elements. Review of the documents is advised for a complete explanation of all of the conditions and responsibilities that apply to homeowners in the association.
